Bodies in Protest:

Understanding self-harm in immigration detention

Author: Jennifer Vallentine
Supervisor: Professor Brigitte Lueger-Schuster
Abstract

Self-harm in immigration detention is more than just a symptom of mental ill-health. This thesis argues that it should instead be seen as a form of communication – an act of resistance and protest by detainees in the face of the human rights violations of incarceration.

Currently, most research into self-harm in immigration detention focuses on the causal links between incarceration and high rates of self-harm. It does not seek to understand why people in immigration harm themselves, nor what these actions mean. This thesis argues that self-harm should be examines within the context of systemic violence and alongside a structural analysis of power, resistance, vulnerability and agency.

Data from interviews and research are examined within the prism of a theory of violence and sovereign power. This unique approach requires incorporating multiple disciplines including psychology, psychoanalysis, philosophy, political science and queer theory.

Relying heavily on the works of Michel Foucault and Judith Butler, this thesis concludes that even in situations of total power such as immigration detention, people are not passive acceptors of injustice. They retain the ability to act. In settings where official and conventional avenues of communication have been cut off, their resistance takes on non-conventional forms and the body is a last resort of action. Detainees’ bodies are literal sites where sovereign power is not only played out, but also opposed.

This research seeks to provide a more nuanced and structural understanding of self-harm. It also challenges the complicit reinforcement of dominant power structures which flow from traditional readings of self-harm. This approach ultimately allows the rehumanisation of immigration detainees and their actions.
Table of Contents

Abstract.................................................................................................................................................. 3

Table of Contents.................................................................................................................................. 5

Dedication................................................................................................................................................ 6

Acknowledgments.................................................................................................................................. 7

Introduction ......................................................................................................................................... 8
  i. Rationale......................................................................................................................................... 9
  ii. Methodology ............................................................................................................................... 13
  iii. Structure ................................................................................................................................... 14
  iv. Global context and background on immigration detention ...................................................... 16

1. The mental health impact of immigration detention ..................................................................... 20
   1.1 Outlining research into effects of immigration detention ....................................................... 21
       1.1.1 Research specifically into self-harm within immigration detention .............................. 26
   1.2 Limitations of existing research ............................................................................................. 29
   1.3 The limitations of self-harm data .......................................................................................... 31

2. Psychoanalytic understandings of self-harm ............................................................................... 34

3. A structural analysis: sovereign power and immigration detention ........................................... 38
   3.1 Sovereignty and the creation of the non-citizen ...................................................................... 39
   3.2 Bio-power and states of exception ....................................................................................... 40
   3.3 Agamben, bare life and immigration detention ..................................................................... 41

4. Redefining vulnerability and resistance ....................................................................................... 46
   4.1 The complexity of vulnerability – moving away from dichotomies ....................................... 46
   4.2 “Everyday resistance” – redefining resistance ......................................................................... 48

5. Self-harm and the body .................................................................................................................... 51
   5.1 The speaking body – self-harm as a form of communication .................................................... 52
   5.2 Sovereignty of the self – self-harm as regaining control and calling into question the legitimacy of the state ............................................................................................................. 54

Conclusion............................................................................................................................................. 60

Bibliography......................................................................................................................................... 64
2016

Bodies in protest: understanding self-harm in immigration detention

Vallentine, Jennifer

https://doi.org/20.500.11825/236

Downloaded from Open Knowledge Repository, Global Campus' institutional repository